Predicted substantial El Nino event to affect Mozambique as it hits Eastern Africa

The Australian Bureau of Meteorology has stated that a “substantial” El Nino weather pattern is developing for the first time in five years.

El Nino is characterised by an abnormal warming of the surface waters of the Pacific Ocean and has a significant effect on weather around the world. This phenomenon has been associated with a wetter than normal weather pattern in eastern Africa and a hotter and drier than normal pattern in southern Africa.

Sub-heading

The last El Nino five years ago was linked with poor monsoons in Southeast Asia, droughts in southern Australia, the Philippines and Ecuador, blizzards in the United States, heatwaves in Brazil and extreme flooding in Mexico.

Sub sub heading

In Mozambique El Nino is associated with drought during the second half of what should be the rainy season (January to March). Normally January and February are the wettest months of the year. Drought in these months could lead to severe crop failures. El Nino is also linked to higher rainfall in November, early on in the rainy season.

The Australian researchers explained to reporters that their models show that the phenomenon could intensify from September onwards, and thus could have serious consequences for southern Africa in early 2016.

The last El Nino led to tens of billions of dollars in economic damages in the Asia Pacific. This year, a strong El Nino could take an even bigger toll in certain countries, analysts said. Grain prices have, however, not yet factored in the threat to supplies from an El Nino, largely because similar predictions for bad weather in 2014 did not come to pass. In fact, good crops replenished stocks last year. In the absence of a weather premium, prices of grains such as wheat and rice remain near multi-month lows. Wheat futures , down a fifth so far this year, are near five-year lows, while Asia rice is at its weakest since June.

India: among the worst hit

Many farming communities are feeling the strain after damage from unseasonal rains this year. Now if the summer rains are below normal, rural discontent will deepen. The monsoons are vital for India as half its croplands lack irrigation while the farm sector accounts for 14 per cent of its economy. India's weather bureau has forecast weaker rainfall this year, citing a 70 per cent El Nino probability.
